The North Dakota Department of Human Services (ND DHS), with support from the National Center on Advancing Person-Centered Practices and Systems, is developing and implementing a statewide plan to enhance person-centered practices for all populations served by ND DHS and its multiple service providers. The purpose of this Guide is to assist North Dakota in fully and effectively including individuals who receive services in system planning efforts.
Five Strategies to Successfully Engage Individuals Who Receive Services

This Guide details five strategies and proven practices to directly involve individuals who receive services in workgroups and teams.

1. Authentic Membership
   - Provide equal status and recognition of the importance of the individual’s presence as any other member of the workgroup.
   - Confirm leadership commitment
   - Show hospitality
   - Provide financial assistance
   - Form partnerships to recruit participants

2. Full Participation
   - Provide individuals with the means to be present and engaged in carrying out their responsibilities.
   - Appoint at least three participants
   - Offer interpretation and captioning services
   - Hold orientation sessions
   - Hold pre-meetings
   - Facilitate meetings with proper techniques
   - Take frequent breaks
   - Provide training sessions
   - Promote participation in committees or subcommittees
   - Engage in team-building activities or exercises
   - Encourage contact with workgroup leaders between meetings

3. Effective Communication Supports & Mentors
   - Provide individuals with tools and coaching and opportunities to prepare for and be effective at workgroup meetings.
   - Offer multiple means of engagement

4. Meaningful Contributions
   - Allow individuals to provide input and assistance that is important to the policymaking body in ways that utilize their ideas and lived experience.
   - Provide important assignments or roles to participants on behalf of the workgroup
   - Solicit agenda items from all members
   - Assist participants in identifying preferred areas of input or concerns

5. True Influence
   - True influence occurs when individuals enhance or alter the substance, direction, and outcomes of policymaking in ways that positively impact the lives of individuals who receive services.
   - Provide leadership roles for participants in the workgroup
   - Follow through with recommendations by participants
   - Adopt the mantra “Nothing About Us Without Us”
Background

For decades, people with disabilities and others who rely on long-term services and supports have said, “Nothing About Us Without Us” when it comes to human service system planning and implementation. And over the last several years, the federal government and foundations have increased their demands for enhanced engagement with individuals who receive services in the projects they fund. As a result, more engagement efforts are occurring across the country, in all social service fields and with multiple constituencies.

North Dakota is developing a strong and consistent statewide vision and universal understanding of person-centeredness across all North Dakota Department of Human Services (ND DHS) entities and community partners. To implement the person-centered practices initiative and assist individuals in having control over the life they desire and fully engaging in their communities, North Dakota will:

• bring diverse voices to the table;
• support individuals participating in services and statewide system change efforts;
• transform policies to reflect statewide person-centered values and culture; and
• ensure communication is accessible and relatable.

Guidelines for Engaging Individuals Who Receive Services

Purpose

The purpose of this Guide is to assist North Dakota to fully and effectively include individuals who receive services—also referred to here as participants—in the public policy decisions in these systems change efforts. These evidence-based guidelines are built from a national research study and decades of direct work in the field of social services (Friedman, Beckwith & Conroy, 2016). They showcase:

• desired goals and outcomes of engaging individuals who receive services;
• current best practices in the United States and Canada; and
• tips to assist ND DHS leadership, staff, and service providers in effectively engaging individuals who receive services in workgroups, public policy, and decision-making processes.

The goal to consistently include individuals who receive services in decision-making requires them to be in the room and at the table when decisions are being made. ND DHS is currently engaged in major system change efforts across its multiple divisions to implement person-centered practices.
These guidelines are based on the goal of individuals who receive services being fully included in decision-making bodies on an ongoing basis. This premise requires that individuals who receive services be at the table and in the room when decisions are being made. This is best enunciated by the disability rights movement’s mantra, “Nothing About Us Without Us.” The planning, design, implementation, and monitoring of state systems’ change efforts are vested in fully including individuals who receive services in policymaking through membership in workgroups and teams that engage in systems change activities. Workgroups are often a small group of people who represent a target group or organization and come together with a common goal or deliverable. While other forms of engagement are useful—listening tours, focus groups, surveys, public forums, and interviews—research clearly shows that connection and ongoing direct involvement are necessary to encourage full participation and allow everyone to learn from each other.

Barriers to Engagement

To be successful in these efforts, we must recognize the barriers faced by individuals who receive services and government officials:

- Individuals who receive services have often been treated as second-class citizens and face many barriers to full participation, including trusting government efforts.
- Government officials have conflicting priorities and face significant time and resource constraints to pursuing engagement efforts with individuals who receive services.

Given these known barriers, it is critical that efforts to fully engage individuals who receive services in public policy utilize proven and successful evidence-based practices.

Benefits of Engagement

As shown in the figure above, there are varying levels of engagement as individuals move up the “Ladder of Engagement” from tokens to full partners in decision-making.
Expected Benefits of Full Participation by Individuals Who Receive Services

A key question in fully including individuals who receive services in public policy is: What are the benefits of this effort? There has been a long history of the effort to fully include constituents in policymaking going back to the Great Society programs of the 1960s. These efforts have resulted in stronger voices for women, racial and ethnic minority groups, older adults, young people, people with disabilities, and people with lower socioeconomic status. In the current effort by ND DHS, the expected benefits of full participation of individuals who receive services include the following:

1. Improve program designs and strategies.
2. Make more informed decisions.
3. Gain buy-in and support of individuals who receive services and their families.
4. Implement successful system changes.
5. Increase equity through more culturally responsive and relevant policies, programs, and services.
6. Enhance accountability and credibility for ND DHS to include individuals who receive services in policymaking.
7. Find common ground among individuals who receive services and state officials.
8. Build the capacity for ND DHS to successfully engage individuals who receive services in projects.
9. Develop the leadership skills of individuals to effectively participate in systems change policy making and implementation activities.
10. Empower individuals who receive services in a safe and welcoming environment.
11. Model behavior for other advocates, families, professionals and providers on how to successfully engage individuals who receive services in person-centered thinking, planning, and practices.

State-Level Commitments

To ensure long-term success, ND DHS Executive and Senior Leadership must take two essential actions for engaging individuals who receive services:

1. Designate one person in each division as the person responsible for leading engagement efforts with individuals who receive services. Responsibilities include selecting and inviting individuals, promoting attendance, and encouraging active participation.
2. Acknowledge and support the staff time and resources required for successful implementation. Engagement with individuals who receive services does not happen on its own or without someone having this effort as their focus.

Five Strategies to Successfully Engage Individuals Who Receive Services

These guidelines detail five strategies and proven practices to directly involve people in workgroups and teams.

First Strategy: Authentic Membership

Authentic Membership provides equal status and recognition of the importance of the individual’s presence as any other member of the workgroup.

Practices that Promote Authentic Membership

1. Confirm Leadership Commitment – As Tia Nelis, founder of Self-Advocates Becoming Empowered, succinctly states, “Get the support of the leader or go home.” Without the support of leaders, it is very difficult to make progress.

2. Show Hospitality – Many individuals who receive services have been devalued, excluded, and had their voices suppressed by society. Being made to feel welcome and building relationships with other group members are important components to being able to speak up and contribute. Encourage and create opportunities to get to know fellow members. Other group members may need help in meeting and getting to know individuals participating and overcoming their own fears and uncertainties.

3. Provide Financial Assistance – State staff, providers, and professional advocates are often paid to participate in engagement efforts. Most other participants are not paid and many live on limited incomes. Consider providing stipends for participation; it is critical to cover travel and meal expenses.

4. Form Partnerships to Recruit Participants – Will members be recruited as individuals or as members of a constituency group? Forming partnerships with constituency-run organizations and matching the interests of participants with the needs of a workgroup greatly helps recruitment. Participation is also shown to be more effective when participants are representing and accountable to a constituency group. Partnerships with leaders and trusted community members from traditionally underrepresented groups will promote more equitable recruitment and representation.

Second Strategy: Full Participation

Full Participation provides individuals with the means to be present and engaged in carrying out their responsibilities.

Practices that Promote Full Participation

1. Appoint At Least Three Participants – Research conducted primarily by women’s groups shows that it takes at least three members of a devalued group to be present to have an impact on policy. When there is one person, the individual can be fearful of speaking up and afraid they will not be listened to. Two people represent a potential “clique.” It takes three people to show different and countervailing opinions, which become valued within the group.

2. Offer Interpretation and Captioning Services – Demonstrating linguistic competence by offering interpretation services and providing closed captioning or other services demonstrates a commitment to equity and inclusion.

3. Hold Orientation Sessions – An initial meeting helps all group members learn the purpose and expectations of the workgroup and helps everyone become a contributing member in a shorter timeframe.

4. Hold Pre-Meetings – Informal meetings prior to workgroup meetings provide a time to answer questions, review the agenda, and identify priority areas of focus. These meetings are helpful for both individuals who receive services and other group members who choose to attend.

5. Facilitate Meetings with Proper Techniques – Implementing good meeting techniques makes a big difference on the success of the meeting for everyone. Promote a welcoming and safe environment that encourages active participation. Welcome and solicit individuals’ voices and opinions. Discourage jargon and acronyms.

6. Take Frequent Breaks – Most participants are not used to sitting for long periods and discussing complex issues in closed meeting rooms. Breaks allow downtime and the ability to ask questions about the discussion topics without interrupting the meeting or feeling embarrassed.
7. Provide Training Sessions – Schedule meetings to help participants understand the issues and changes under consideration.

8. Promote Participation in Committees or Subcommittees – Appoint individuals who receive services as committee members or co-leaders on projects of interest and pair people for team projects.

9. Engage in Team-Building Activities or Exercises – Create team-building opportunities, such as icebreakers to get to know each other, share meals together, and set up discussion opportunities.

10. Encourage Contact with Workgroup Leaders Between Meetings – Create phone trees and establish ongoing check-ins via phone or video conferencing.

Third Strategy: Effective Communication Supports and Mentors

Effective Communication Supports and Mentors provides individuals with tools, coaching and opportunities to prepare for and be effective at workgroup meetings.

Practices that Promote Effective Communication Supports and Mentors

1. Offer Multiple Means of Engagement – When possible, provide participants with options for engaging in a way that is convenient and accessible for them. This may include holding multiple sessions at different times of the day and offering opportunities to engage in-person or online via videoconference, phone, or social media.

2. Provide Transportation Support – Transportation is usually the biggest barrier to participation. Most individuals who receive services do not own a car and are dependent on others to be able to attend meetings. Individuals should not be responsible for their own transportation when they have little control over its provision. It is critical to provide support to help with meeting attendance.

3. Give Travel Advances – Most individuals who receive services have limited funds and do not have cash to pay upfront for gas or public transportation as they await travel reimbursements. Travel advances can solve this problem.

4. Provide Agendas Two Weeks in Advance of Meetings – Many individuals who receive services need help reading or comprehending meeting documents. Providing documents two weeks in advance of the meeting allows individuals the needed time to review the materials.
5. Create Easy Read, Plain Language Documents and Alternative Formats – Use basic fonts, large sizes, color coding, icons, and plain language to create agendas, meeting minutes, and other documents for your workgroup members with low literacy, vision issues, or other invisible disabilities. Know what your workgroup participants need and give them information in alternative formats (audio, braille, electronic versions, large print, or readable PDFs) as needed.

6. Ensure Materials Are Culturally and Linguistically Accessible – Translate materials into commonly spoken languages for participants whose first language is not English. Make sure that content – including pictures, examples, and stories – reflect and are respectful of the cultures and values of participants.

7. Offer Individual Mentors – Mentors can be helpful in assisting individuals who receive services with learning the meeting processes and understanding agendas and documents. Mentors can help individuals who receive services more quickly become effective members of the workgroup. Some organizations find it beneficial to offer mentors to all workgroup members in the beginning stages of formation. Mentors can be helpful on an ongoing basis both before and during meetings to offer advice and to facilitate and enhance the full engagement of individuals in meetings.

8. Provide Accommodations for People with Disabilities – Some individuals who receive services will need accommodations in order to fully participate. These may include accessible documents, American Sign Language interpreters, breaks, captioning, Communication Access Realtime Translation (CART), meals, note-taking, perfume-free events, personal care attendants, and physical space. It is necessary to identify and plan for accommodations prior to the meetings.

9. Plan Meeting Room Arrangements – Room arrangements play a major role in successful meetings and should not be overlooked. Consider meeting details such as round vs. square tables, where someone in a wheelchair or with a cane sits, the ability to hear each other, who speaks first, how often someone speaks, and who is listened to. Seating near leadership or speakers can often be helpful for individuals who receive services.

Fourth Strategy: Meaningful Contributions

Meaningful Contributions allow individuals to provide input and assistance that is important to the policymaking body in ways that utilize their ideas and lived experience.
Practices that Promote Meaningful Contributions

1. Provide Important Assignments or Roles to Individuals Who Receive Services on Behalf of the Workgroup – Assign individuals who receive services to serve as co-leaders, committee chairs, reporters, timekeepers, greeters, distributors of documents, or Sargent of Arms.

2. Solicit Agenda Items from All Members – Include participants’ areas of interest in meeting agendas.

3. Assist Individuals in Identifying Preferred Areas of Input or Concerns – Find agenda items that relate to the participants’ interests and where their engagement can make a meaningful contribution.

Fifth Strategy: True Influence

True Influence occurs when individuals enhance or alter the substance, direction, and outcomes of the policymaking body in ways that positively impact the lives of individuals who receive services.

Practices that Promote True Influence

1. Provide Leadership Roles for Participants in the Workgroup – Appoint individuals who receive services to serve as committee chairs, co-chairs, and officers.

2. Follow Through with Recommendations by Participants – After a meeting or engagement activity, provide participants with a summary of what was discussed and what actions will result. Highlight and document participants’ ideas, comments, and discussion points. Demonstrate that you are using feedback to inform system changes.

3. Adopt the Mantra “Nothing About Us Without Us” – Commit to practice and implement the mandate that individuals who receive services will be at the table whenever policies are discussed or decisions are made.
